Question. What about using a rating of all or most activities, and giving each activity a "rating" in terms of sustainability. This would not be easy, but the sum of these ratings could be a more valuable assessment of the final figure.

Although not officially endorsing the 100 million population in Canada, the three major parties (Liberal, NDP, Conservative) all support major population growth, including massive immigration, which necessitates "growth". If a half century of Limits to Growth have been unable to change that, why do you expect different life philosophies to change that?

Question: Growth isn't necessary for most people, but it is vital for certain groups - developers, speculators, debt institutions and media corporations. The cries we hear from growth are from those groups 24/7 in the corporate media but people generally want costs to go down, not work hours to go up. Can we please call out those groups who are growth dependent.

Peter, In my opinion, "different life philosophies" (different mindsets or "perceptions") will disclose opportunities, connections, context, solutions and "tools" (on Ted Manning's screen), which we cannot perceive well if at all through the Silo Mindset that has been dominant for several decades.

Hi Everyone. The United Nations, like all nation states conducts and has conducted many social experiments across the world. Such experiments, met with success (example - basic education) some with epic failure (protection of the weakest/poorest peoples on earth). Hence, are we trying to conceive yet another social experiment, at a global or local level? Thanks

14:21:14 From Hector E. Garcia to Everyone:

Samrat, I believe the epic failures you mention are primarily due to the condescending mindset that guided those efforts. Economist Joseph Stiglitz talked and wrote about it and the need for correcting it before and after he was let go as head economist by World Bank. "If you have come to help me, you're wasting your time. But if your liberation is bound up with mine, then let's walk together."

Bravo, Ted! McKinsey & Company (working with scenarios developed by central banks) suggest that globally we need to devote 8 to 9 % of GDP from 2022 (when the report came out) to 2050. It appears the global "We" are not making this investment:

am about to start trying to determine the carrying capacity of Canada. My suspicion is that it is much less than 40 million.

14:26:05 From Samrat B to Everyone:

Thanks Hector. The "condescending mindset" agreed. I feel the fault lies in how the state looks at people, resources, land, rivers etc. For eons the specialists of all sorts have imposed changes on other people - which leads to problems, misery, dislocation and consequent failure. My question was is WellBeing another social experiment?

good question Dave. When 3rd world countries become educated, they realize that more population is not necessarily better and the tendency is to have fewer children when they become more educated, Canada, is going the opposite direction, demonstrating its lack of education in this area
